3. RESPONSE TO THIS TENDER

Tender: Consultancy Services for Data Analytics & AI Maturity Assessment

Institution: Coop Bank Tanzania Limited

Tender Type: Consultancy Services

3.1 Our Understanding of the Requirements

Coop Bank Tanzania Limited, formed from the 2024 merger of Kilimanjaro Cooperative Bank (KCBL) and Tandahimba Community Bank, is seeking a qualified consultancy firm to conduct a comprehensive Data Analytics and Artificial Intelligence (AI) Maturity Assessment. This engagement is fundamentally a diagnostic and strategic exercise — the bank needs an independent, expert-led evaluation of where it currently stands in its data and AI journey, and a clear, actionable roadmap for where it needs to go. Post-merger, the bank faces a particularly complex data environment: two legacy core banking systems, potentially divergent data architectures, duplicate customer records, and inconsistent data governance practices across what were formerly two separate institutions. The maturity assessment must account for this merger context and assess the integrated entity's readiness rather than either predecessor institution in isolation.

A Data Analytics and AI Maturity Assessment for a financial institution of this nature typically spans five critical dimensions: (1) Data Infrastructure and Architecture — the quality, completeness, and accessibility of data assets including the data warehouse, ETL pipelines, and integration layers connecting the core banking system to downstream analytical tools; (2) Data Governance and Quality — policies, stewardship, lineage tracking, master data management, and compliance with Bank of Tanzania data reporting requirements; (3) Analytics Capabilities — the spectrum from descriptive reporting through diagnostic, predictive, and prescriptive analytics, including credit risk models, fraud detection, and customer segmentation; (4) AI and Machine Learning Readiness — existing AI use cases, model governance frameworks, explainability standards, and the bank's talent and tooling to develop and maintain ML models; and (5) Organizational and Cultural Maturity — the degree to which data-driven decision making is embedded in day-to-day operations across branches, products, credit, compliance, and executive leadership.

The consultancy output will almost certainly be required to deliver a current-state maturity scorecard against an established framework (such as Gartner's Analytics Maturity Model, the CMMI Data Management Maturity model, or a custom banking-sector framework), a gap analysis mapping current capabilities to industry benchmarks, prioritized recommendations spanning technology investments, process improvements, and capability building, and a phased strategic roadmap with specific milestones, KPIs, and estimated investment ranges. Given the bank's cooperative roots and community banking mandate, the assessment must also address how advanced analytics and AI can deepen financial inclusion — a key regulatory and strategic priority for Bank of Tanzania — rather than purely optimizing for commercial returns.

Coop Bank Tanzania operates in a competitive landscape where larger banks like CRDB and NMB are already deploying sophisticated AI-driven credit scoring, chatbots, and fraud detection systems. This tender signals that Coop Bank's leadership recognizes the urgency of closing that capability gap. The consultancy must therefore not only assess the current state but also benchmark against peer institutions within Tanzania and comparable cooperative banks in East Africa, and deliver recommendations that are realistic given the bank's resource constraints as a community-focused institution rather than a tier-one commercial bank.

3.2 Why ZIMA Solutions

ZIMA Solutions Limited brings a rare combination of deep Tanzanian banking domain expertise and active AI/ML delivery capability that positions us uniquely for this engagement. Unlike international consulting firms who would need to first learn the Tanzanian regulatory and banking context, ZIMA has already deployed and maintains four active Bank of Tanzania system integrations — RTGS, TIPS, GePG, and NIDA — at 99.9% uptime. This means our assessment team understands not just the theoretical data architecture of Tanzanian banks, but the actual data flows, API structures, regulatory reporting constraints, and integration patterns that shape what analytics capabilities are practically achievable for an institution like Coop Bank Tanzania.

Our hands-on experience implementing core banking systems for banks, SACCOs, and microfinance institutions gives us direct insight into the specific data quality and governance challenges that cooperative and community banks face — challenges that are quite different from those at commercial banks. We have observed first-hand how post-merger data consolidation plays out in Tanzanian banking environments, the gaps that typically exist between what core banking systems capture and what analytical systems need, and the practical constraints around IT budgets, talent pipelines, and technology vendor ecosystems available to mid-tier Tanzanian banks. This contextual knowledge means our maturity assessment will produce findings that are grounded and actionable, not generic frameworks transplanted from a Western banking context.

ZIMA is not a pure advisory firm — we actively build and deploy the AI systems we advise on. Our current portfolio includes fraud detection models, credit scoring engines, conversational AI agents (WhatsApp and web-based), and predictive analytics dashboards, all built for financial institutions in Tanzania. This means our assessors are not evaluating AI maturity from a theoretical perspective but from the vantage point of practitioners who understand what strong AI governance looks like in implementation, what data pipeline architectures actually support production ML models, and which capability gaps are genuinely blocking AI adoption versus which are cosmetic. The result is a maturity assessment grounded in practical delivery experience, not consulting theory.

As a Tanzanian company with TIN 181-314-605 and offices in Dar es Salaam, ZIMA is committed to long-term partnership with Coop Bank Tanzania. We are not parachuting in for a short engagement and leaving — we are building our business in the same market. This means our recommendations will be calibrated to the bank's actual implementation capacity, will identify local technology partners and talent sources, and will be designed to create sustainable internal capability rather than perpetual external dependence. Our directors, Andrew Mashamba and Caroline Shija, will be personally engaged in this assignment, not delegated to junior staff.

3.3 Proposed Approach

- Phase 1: Stakeholder Alignment & Assessment Framework Design (Weeks 1–2) — ZIMA will conduct structured interviews with Coop Bank Tanzania's executive team (CEO, CFO, CIO, Chief Risk Officer, Head of Retail), department heads (Credit, Compliance, Operations, IT, Branches), and key data producers and consumers across the business. The goal is to understand strategic priorities, pain points, and existing analytics initiatives before designing the assessment framework. We will customize a maturity model spanning five dimensions — Data Infrastructure, Data Governance & Quality, Analytics Capabilities, AI/ML Readiness, and Organizational Culture

— calibrated to Coop Bank's size, cooperative mandate, and post-merger context. Deliverables: Stakeholder Interview Report, Customized Maturity Framework with scoring rubrics, Assessment Plan with data collection methodology.

- Phase 2: Current State Assessment — Data Infrastructure & Governance (Weeks 2–4) — ZIMA's technical team will conduct a deep inventory of Coop Bank's data estate: core banking system data models, integration architecture, existing data warehouse or reporting databases, ETL processes, and data quality metrics. We will assess the status of post-merger data consolidation — customer master data deduplication, account migration completeness, GL reconciliation, and whether a unified data layer exists. We will evaluate data governance policies: data ownership, data dictionary completeness, lineage documentation, access controls, and alignment with Bank of Tanzania data reporting obligations (SRTF, credit bureau reporting, AML/CFT data requirements). Deliverables: Data Infrastructure Inventory, Data Quality Assessment Report (with specific metrics on completeness, accuracy, consistency, and timeliness), Data Governance Maturity Score, Post-Merger Data Consolidation Gap Analysis.
- Phase 3: Analytics & AI Capability Assessment (Weeks 4–6) — ZIMA will assess the full analytics stack: existing reporting tools and BI platforms, self-service analytics capabilities, advanced analytics use cases (credit scoring, churn prediction, product propensity), and any AI/ML models currently in production or development. We will benchmark findings against peer Tanzanian cooperative banks and East African community banks using ZIMA's existing network and publicly available benchmarks. We will specifically evaluate: fraud detection capabilities versus transaction volumes, credit risk model sophistication versus NPL ratios, customer analytics depth versus product cross-sell performance, and regulatory analytics automation versus manual reporting burden. Deliverables: Analytics Capability Inventory, AI/ML Use Case Register, Competitive Benchmark Report, Maturity Scores across all five dimensions with supporting evidence.
- Phase 4: Gap Analysis, Roadmap Development & Prioritization (Weeks 6–8) — Based on the current state assessment and target maturity definition (agreed with bank leadership in Phase 1), ZIMA will produce a comprehensive gap analysis identifying specific capability deficits, technology gaps, process weaknesses, and talent shortfalls. We will develop a phased 3-year strategic roadmap with: Quick wins (0–6 months) requiring minimal investment but delivering visible value; Foundation investments (6–18 months) establishing the data infrastructure and governance backbone; Advanced capability development (18–36 months) including AI/ML use cases and advanced analytics. Each roadmap initiative will include estimated effort, indicative investment range (in TZS), expected business benefit, implementation risk rating, and sequencing dependencies. Deliverables: Gap Analysis Report, 3-Year Data & AI Strategic Roadmap, Investment Prioritization Matrix, KPI Framework for measuring maturity progress.
- Phase 5: Final Presentation, Knowledge Transfer & Implementation Support Setup (Weeks 8–10) — ZIMA will present findings and recommendations to Coop Bank's Board and Executive Committee in a structured workshop format designed to build consensus and secure buy-in. We will conduct knowledge transfer sessions with the bank's IT and analytics teams to ensure internal ownership of the roadmap. We will produce an Implementation Starter Pack for the highest-priority initiatives — detailed project charters, vendor shortlists, RFP templates, and team capability requirements — so the bank can begin execution immediately after the assessment concludes. Deliverables: Board/Exco Presentation, Final Comprehensive Assessment Report (executive summary + full technical annexes), Implementation Starter Pack for Top 3 Priority Initiatives, 90-Day Quick Win Action Plan.

3.4 Our Value Proposition

ZIMA's value proposition for this engagement is the combination of three qualities that are rarely available from a single firm in the Tanzanian market: banking domain depth, active AI delivery experience, and local market knowledge. International consultancies can bring global frameworks and benchmarks but lack grounding in the specifics of Tanzania's banking infrastructure, regulatory environment, and technology ecosystem. Local IT firms may understand the regulatory context but lack the AI and data science delivery track record to credibly assess AI maturity. ZIMA sits at the intersection — we have built and run the types of systems being assessed, in Tanzanian banks, under Bank of Tanzania oversight. This means our maturity scores will be calibrated to what is actually achievable in this market, not to benchmarks derived from European or US banking contexts where data infrastructure investment levels are an order of magnitude higher. For Coop Bank Tanzania specifically, ZIMA offers a post-merger integration lens that is particularly relevant. Having implemented core banking integrations across multiple institutions, we understand how data architectures diverge over time in different legacy systems and what the practical path to a unified data layer looks like. Our assessment will not just score the bank's current state — it will provide a clear-eyed analysis of the merger integration work still required before advanced analytics becomes viable, and will sequence the roadmap accordingly. This merger-aware approach will save Coop Bank from investing in analytics tooling prematurely, before the data foundation is ready to support it, a mistake that many banks make and that renders early analytics investments ineffective. ZIMA's engagement model for this assessment also includes a commitment to capability building alongside assessment delivery. We will not just hand over a report — we will conduct working sessions with the bank's IT, data, and business teams throughout the engagement so that by the time the final report is delivered, the bank's internal stakeholders have participated in the analysis, understand the findings, and are equipped to drive implementation. This participatory approach increases adoption of recommendations and reduces the risk of the assessment report sitting on a shelf unused — the most common failure mode of maturity assessment engagements.

3.5 Technical Approach & Methodology

ZIMA will apply a structured maturity model assessment methodology anchored in the five-dimension framework described above, drawing on established industry frameworks including the CMMI Data Management Maturity (DMM) model, Gartner's Analytics Maturity Model, and the McKinsey AI Maturity Assessment framework, adapted for the Tanzanian cooperative banking context. Each dimension will be scored on a 1–5 scale with explicit scoring criteria defined upfront and validated with bank stakeholders, ensuring the final scores are defensible and comparable across departments and over time as the bank re-assesses maturity in future years. We will use a combination of structured questionnaires, document reviews, technical system inspections, and stakeholder interviews to triangulate evidence for each maturity score — avoiding the common pitfall of maturity assessments that rely solely on self-reported capability without technical validation.

For the data infrastructure assessment, ZIMA's technical team will conduct direct system analysis where access is granted — reviewing database schemas, ETL job configurations, data quality monitoring outputs, and integration architecture diagrams. For the AI/ML assessment, we will evaluate not just whether AI models exist but whether they meet production-grade standards: model governance documentation, performance monitoring, retraining schedules, explainability for regulatory purposes, and bias testing. This depth of technical assessment is only possible because ZIMA's team members have built and maintained such systems themselves. For the organizational maturity assessment, we will use a structured interview protocol developed from behavioral indicators of data-driven culture — not just whether a data strategy document exists, but whether data insights actually influence credit decisions, product design, and branch operations in daily practice.

Deliverables will follow a structured documentation standard: all reports will be provided in both executive summary format (for board and management consumption) and full technical annex format (for IT and analytics teams). The strategic roadmap will be delivered as both a narrative document and a structured implementation tracker (in Excel/spreadsheet format) that the bank can use directly to monitor progress against the roadmap. All data collected during the assessment will be handled under a strict data confidentiality protocol — no customer PII or sensitive bank data will leave the bank's premises, and all working documents will be returned or destroyed at engagement close.

3.6 Risk Management

The primary risk in a maturity assessment engagement of this nature is stakeholder resistance — department heads who perceive the assessment as a performance review rather than a capability-building exercise may withhold information or provide overly optimistic self-assessments, leading to inflated maturity scores and a roadmap disconnected from reality. ZIMA mitigates this risk through upfront engagement design: the assessment is framed as an organizational capability investment, not an individual performance evaluation; scoring is done at the organizational level, not attributed to specific individuals or teams; and preliminary findings are shared with relevant department heads for validation before finalization, creating buy-in in the process. Our participatory workshop methodology throughout the engagement builds trust with bank staff and reduces the information asymmetry that drives defensive behavior.

A secondary risk specific to Coop Bank Tanzania is the post-merger complexity: the bank may have incomplete visibility into its own data assets and integration architecture given that the KCBL-Tandahimba merger was relatively recent (2024). ZIMA mitigates this through a phased discovery approach — we begin with broad stakeholder mapping to identify who holds knowledge of which systems, then progressively drill into technical specifics with the right subject matter experts. We will also cross-validate findings between the bank's IT team, the core banking system vendor, and any third-party system integrators currently engaged, to build a complete picture even where internal documentation is incomplete. Our timeline builds in contingency for discovery surprises, and our engagement model includes a formal mid-point check-in with Coop Bank's project sponsor to recalibrate scope and timeline if material unexpected complexity is uncovered.
